Italian proverb

Lombardy

The region's most productive zone, Oltrepo Pavese, also ranks as the most anonymous, since much of its wine is sold in bulk to restaurants in nearby cities. But they still produce the robust Barbera, Bonarda and Oltrepo Pavese Rosso, plus fruity white Rieslings and *Moscato*s. Better known Valtellina, produces Valtellina Superiore, which are austere *Nebbiolo*s, but have a deceptive lightness. Some have the strength and stamina to improve for well over a decade.

Piedmonte

Piedmonte is considered a giant of Italian wine. Barolo and Barbaresco are admired as cult wines, and at one time, thought too elaborate for modern palates. But the combination of favorable vintages & perfection of techniques is changing that image. They have retained their ample dimensions while becoming better balanced and more approachable than before. The Alba area is known for its smooth supple Dolcetto and most recently the ubiquitous Barbera. Piedmonte is also the leading producer of sparkling wines, foremost among them is Asti, the world's most popular sweet bubbly wine. Gavi, a still white shows a crisp, yet elegant style, and is thought best with seafood.

Trentino-Alto Adige

Production of the numerous varietal wines is centered in two large zones: Trentino in the south and Alto Adige. Historical emphasis has been on reds. The dominate vine variety is Schiava or Vernatsch which is the source of light, bright reds that mainly are exported to the northern German-speaking countries. Alto Adige's native Lagrein and Trentino's Teroldego stand with northern Italy's most distinguished vines, making wines of singular personality.

Friuli-Venezia Giulia

Friuli has a glowing reputation for white wines made by relatively small wineries, long dominated by Tocai Friulano. The Friulian style in whites favors the exquisitely fresh and fruit, with delicate fragrance and flavor that express clear varietal character. Friulian reds are traditionally light and fruity, best to drink within two to five years of the harvest.

Veneto

Soave, a popular of Italian dry whites, is usually dry and still. Valpolicella is a hearty red to drink young, though it's grapes are also dried and made into the rich, dry Amarone della Valpolicella or the sweet Recioto della Valpolicella. Veneto is also noted for Prosecco, a bubbly dry to sweet white.

Emilia-Romagna

Emilia-Romagna's premier wine is Lambrusco, in frothy shades of purple to pink, from grapes grown on high trellised vines, mainly in the flatlands south of the Po. Romagna's wines are primarily from the native Sangiovese, Trebbiano and Albana, Italy's first white DOCG.

Tuscany

The most famous and popular wine from this region is by far Chianti. All Chianti is made from one major grape variety - Sangiovese. Pure Sangiovese wines are rich in body and intricate in flavor with deep ruby garnet colors. Tuscany's appellation of greatest stature is Brunello di Montalcino. They also make Rosso di Montalcino, a younger wine from Sangiovese, as well as the sweet Moscadello di Montalcino. Not far from Montalcino is Montepulciano, made from a type of Sangiovese. Rosso di Montepulciano is a younger alternative. The production of upscale alternative wines, beginning as a trend in the 1970s, became an essential factor in the general improvement of Tuscan reds. These cult wines have become known as "Super Tuscans". The granddaddy of all Super Tuscans is Sassicaia - a pure cabernet that proved that Italy could make modern reds of international appeal. Antinori's Tignanello, also served as a model for a new style of red wine aged in small oak barrels or barrriques. More recently, Castello Banfi has become a leader in creating exceptional "Super Tuscan" wines to fit a wide variety of tastes and budgets. Today, the Super Tuscans rank among the most esteemed and expensive red wines of Italy.

Marches

In the region of Marches, Verdicchio di Matelica, is grown in limited quantities, which have a moderate body and strength. The red wines of the Marches are based chiefly on Sangiovese and Montepulciano. Rosso Piceno, is dominated by Sangiovese; Rosso Conero, dominated by Montepulciano; both are made to drink within two to four years, when they are round and fresh in flavor.

Liguria

The legend among Liguria's wines is Cinque Terre, a white made around the "five lands", a series of fishing villages nestled in the cliffs along the coast north of La Spezia. Vines there have been planted since antiquity on scarcely accessible terraces, some close enough to the Ligurian Sea to catch the spray from breaking waves. Most Cinque Terre is dry, though the sweet Sciacchetrà is coveted by those in the know.

Molise

Molise, which was once an appendix of Abruzzi, gained official status in wine in the 1980s with the DOCs of Biferno and Pentro di Isernia. The aptitude for vines on the sunny hillsides between the Apennines and the Adriatic indicates that Molise's wine producers could match on a small scale the quality of their neighbors in Apulia or Campania.

Umbria

In Umbria, the modern Orvieto is one of Italy's best-selling whites. Prociano (a local species of Trebbiano) and Malvasia prevail in Orvieto. The most prestigious Umbrian wine is the red Torgiano Rosso riserva - based on Sangiovese. Under the name Rubesco, it has been known to age to unique splendor for two decades or more. Vin Santo, pressed from semi-dried Grechetto or Malvasia grapes is usually sweet and most prized.

Abruzzo

The native Montepulciano, not to be confused with the town of that name in Tuscany) becomes a red of irresistible character, full-bodied, even robust, with a capacity of age but with such supple smoothness that it can be eminently drinkable even when young. As for the whites, the Trebbiano is based on the Tuscan variety, which makes light, acidic whites of subtle aroma and flavor.

Latium (Lazio)

Latium's hills, favored by ample sunshine on fertile volcanic soil, seem to be naturally suited to the production of white wines based on various types of Malvasia and Trebbiano grapes. Led by Frascati and Marino, they are pleasingly soft though not so sweet as to overwhelm the flavor of food. They were easy, every day wines not designed to last long or travel far. Latium's reds vary in composition - mostly based on Montepulciano and Sangiovese.

Apulia

Apulian wines are widely appreciated for value. Dry wines from the northern area tend to have moderate strength with impressive fruit, good acidity and ample bouquet. Red wines generally derive from the native Uva di Troia or Bombino Nero as well as Montepulciano and Sangiovese. The famous Primitivo, is said to be the grandfather of the American Zinfandel grape. It has the fullness of a Chianti, but a softer palate.

Calabria

Calabria's best-known wine is Cirò, which grows in low hills along the Ionian coast between the ancient Greek cities of Sibari and Crotona. Local legend has it that Cirò descended directly from Krimisa, the wine Calabrian athletes drank to celebrate victory in an early Olympiad. The classic Cirò is red, which in the reserve version has the capacity to age beyond a decade from certain vintages. There is also a rosato to drink young and a bianco from Greco grapes that can show impressive youthful freshness.

Campania

In Campania, a majority of producers strive to make the most of native vines, including an honor roll of so-called "archaeological varieties" which date back to antiquity. The noblest of red varieties is Aglianico, which makes the red Taurasi, which has been called "the Barolo of the south" due to its size and ability to age. Campania's DOC zones also include the islands of Capri and Ischia, as well as Penisola Sorrentina and Costa d'Amalfi.

Basilicata

The Greeks brought the Aglianico vine to Basilicata. Grown on the slopes of the extinct volcano, Monte Vulture, it makes a robust, deeply colored wine that can improve with age, becoming increasingly refined and complex in flavor. There are also young versions of the wine, some semi-sweet or even sparkling. Aglianico is also used for wines under the regions single IGT of Basilicata. White wines of interest are the sweet Moscato and Malvasia.
